WELCOME TO DIGITAL IMAGING

Hello. I'm Professor Bill Kovarik, your instructor for Digital Imaging. Contact me any time at wkovarik@radford.edu. Also, I have regular zoom office hours on Monday and Wednesday mornings, and I'm also in the office at 2109 Hemphill Hall most Tuesdays and Thursdays 8:30 – 9:30 am.

This syllabus will help you get started in the COMS 226 course, describing 1) How to get started and where resources are located; 2) our learning objectives; 3) assessment methods, and 4) support and accessibility policies.

COMS 226 course is an introduction to the how and why of visual communication -- the methods as well as some historical context and aesthetic issues. Or, more formally:

Digital imaging and visual communication

Images surround us in daily life. They inspire us, warn us, persuade us, and constantly compete for our attention. We don't remember most of them, but some of them seem to stick with us. What is it that makes an image memorable or persuasive? How does a strong image appeal to our common psychological foundations? And, for example, why does this image by Dorothea Lange stand out from the others she took the same day in 1937?

It seems simple to begin with, but there are complex processes going on beneath the surface.

Visual communication is the original form of mass communication, going back long before the introduction of writing and, actually, forming the basis of written language.

These symbols and archetypes can be traced even further back, as a basis
